Calculating Metals and Energies Margin Requirements

Account base currency: USD

Position: Buy 0.01 lot of XAUUSD @ 1,316.99

Lotsize:100

Marging Requirement: 0.2% of Notional Value

Notional Value: $0.01 \times 100 \times 1,316.99 = 1,316.99$

Margin=1,316.99*0.002=2.63

For Beginners:

The margin is amount needed to trade 0.01 lot of XAUUSD. 0.01 is minimum lot, 100 is the maximum lot. To buy/sell bigger lots, means higher margin requirements which in turn require bigger account balance or higher leverage or both.

Leverage is way of increasing the value of account balance in order place more trades or bigger lots. It operates like a loan. Be careful how you use it.

Spread is the difference between the buying price and selling price as seen from how the banks quote them. The banks and brokers make their profit from it.

Swap enables banks and brokers make provision for drastic changes in prices that occur during/after break-time. Most traders close all orders just before break-time to avoid negative swap (fees). NB positive swaps can be great earnings too.

HFCOPY VS PAMM

Both HFCOPY and HFM PAMM are investment services offered by HFM, however there are differences between the two.

HFCOPY

A follower account is created. the strategy of manager is copied to the follower account.

The investor can also trade at the same time or close trades of the manager with follower account.

The manager has no control on investor's fund. The manager cannot trade with investors' fund or withdraw it.

Minimum requirement ($10-$25) is lower and managers trade with smaller in lots so that most followers can get a good copy ratio.

HFM PAMM

No separate follower account is created so no copy service takes place. Investors' funds are added to manager's fund.

No follower account is created so the investor cannot trade or close manager's trades.

The manager has control over investors' funds as they are put together.

Minimum requirement ($250) is higher and managers trade in bigger lots as the funds are put together.
